

I notice the company name and job description fields are empty, which makes it impossible for me to write a genuinely personalized cover letter. A good cover letter needs to speak specifically to the company's mission, culture, product, and the particular challenges of the role — otherwise it reads as generic and template-like, which won't serve the candidate well.

To write a compelling cover letter, could you provide:

1. Company name — Who are they? What do they build?
2. Job description — What are the specific responsibilities, tech stack details, and requirements listed?
3. Any additional context — How did the candidate find the role? Is there anything specific about the company they admire or connect with?

Even a rough job description copy-paste would help enormously. With that information, I can craft something that actually stands out rather than a letter that hiring managers will immediately recognize as a fill-in-the-blank exercise.
