

I notice the company name and full job description weren't included in your message — without those details, I can't write a truly personalized cover letter that speaks to the specific company, their product, and the particular problems they're trying to solve.

To write you the strongest possible letter, could you share:

1. Company name — so I can reference who they are and why you want to work there specifically
2. Job description — even a partial one, so I can match your experience to their stated requirements and priorities

The difference between a generic letter and one that actually gets responses usually comes down to those specific details. A hiring manager at a backend-focused team can tell immediately when someone has written to them versus filled in a template.

Drop those in and I'll turn around a strong, tailored letter for you.
