

I notice the company name and job description fields are empty, which makes it impossible to write a genuinely personalized cover letter — and a generic one wouldn't serve you well.

To write something compelling and specific, could you provide:

1. Company name — so I can reference their product, mission, or culture meaningfully
2. Job description — even a rough outline helps me mirror their language and highlight what matters most to them

With those details, I can craft a letter that speaks directly to what they're looking for rather than sounding like it could have been sent to anyone. That specificity is usually what gets a response.
